

An Open Letter to the California Delegation February 24, 2014

Dear Senators and Members of the House of Representatives:

Our State is suffering the worst drought in recorded history. Its effects are being felt today by nearly every community and in every sector of the State's economy. And the worst is yet to come. Unless there is a major change in weather patterns, the weeks and months ahead will bring wildfires, critical shortages of electric power and drinking water, business failures, unemployment, and other drought-related consequences, including harm to fish and wildlife, that will linger far into the future.

Our purpose is to outline the immediate threat that the drought poses to California's $44.7 billion agricultural sector, and to respectfully insist that Members of the California Congressional Delegation set aside their regional, ideological and political differences and work together to address the water supply crisis.

The stakes could not be higher and time is of essence.

This year, the Federal Central Valley Project and the State Water Project (Projects) have said they will provide zero water allocations to the farmers, farm workers, and communities that depend upon those projects. Independent, locally owned reservoirs also are running dry, and some water rights holders will see their supplies reduced for the first time ever. The dire consequences of this situation cannot be overstated. The orchards and vines that produce the wine, grapes, citrus, almonds, walnuts, and other products for which California is famous cannot survive without water. Without water, we cannot grow the feed needed to support our dairy industry, and we have no hay to keep alive the cattle that graze on natural grasses grown in wetter years. Without water, we cannot grow strawberries or lettuce, and more than 75% of the nation's supply of each of those crops will be lost.

What happens this year will fundamentally change the face of California's agriculture forever. Family farmers whose names appear below have been good stewards of the land for generations, but are now facing catastrophic losses from which they may not recover. Young farmers just starting out are at great risk of being driven off their land. Thousands of men and women working throughout our great and diverse community – from the field to the restaurant – are overwhelmed by the uncertainty of what this “mega drought” means for their families.

The current drought is a natural disaster. Rainfall and snow packs are at record lows this winter. However, the Projects were designed to smooth out California’s unpredictable weather to provide reliable water supplies in even the driest of years – and they have met this challenge through previous years of drought. But the Projects no longer work as they were designed to work. Consider the fact that in 2011 California’s reservoirs were filled to overflowing by a year of heavy rains. Or that beginning 2013, storage was above average while water supply allocations were well below it. But today, California’s reservoirs are empty. The reserves that should be there to carry us through this extremely dry year are gone. As a result of our lost water supplies, groundwater – where it’s available – is being depleted at an alarming rate to keep farms and ranches alive, resulting in higher farming costs and damage to aquifers.

The failure of the Projects to function as they should in this drought is not because of the weather. It is the result of short-sighted and unbalanced application of environmental regulations. Yes, laws to protect the environment are necessary – no one knows this better than the farmers who make their living off the land. But the agencies charged with carrying out those laws have insisted on spending all of the stored water when it’s available with no eye toward the future. Reservoirs such as Shasta and Folsom have been drained to meet regulatory burdens that are set far too high to meet the needs for dry years, and the cushion that should help us through has all been lost. We cannot continue to live from crisis to crisis. Operating the Projects in this manner is quite simply unsustainable.

Most Californians, whether we live in cities or out in the country, value California’s agricultural economy and heritage and don’t want to lose them. But that is exactly what will happen unless the Central Valley Project and the State Water Project are operated in the short-term to maximize the availability of what little water we do have this year, and management of the Projects is reformed for the long-term to provide the flexibility necessary to balance environmental and human needs in good years and bad. Obviously, the Projects lack that balance and flexibility now, which has left the most productive agricultural State in our Nation in grave peril.

You, our elected representatives, represent us all, just as this crisis affects us all. You have the responsibility to ensure that California’s agriculture has every tool available to survive and recover from the current drought and the hard, dry years that the future certainly holds.

The House has passed one bill to address this crisis, and the Senate has just introduced another. The concepts in the bills are very different, and we have different views on these measures. But we are in complete agreement that two separate bills are of absolutely no value. What’s needed is a single bill that can be enacted by Congress and signed into law by the President within the next few weeks. Anything less will be your collective failure.

It will be hard work to reach an agreement and enact a final legislation to wisely manage California’s water now and in the future, but that’s the kind of work we elected you to do.

That's your job. You cannot allow partisan or personal animosities to interfere with you doing your job. As Firebaugh farmer Chris Hurd testified before Congress last week, "Putting ideology and partisanship ahead of public service is failure." You must set aside those distractions, show courage, vision and leadership, and roll up your sleeves to work together as professionals to resolve this complex problem. Farmers work hard, and we expect you to do the same. We need you – all of you, northern and southern, Republican and Democrat, House and Senate – to come together and find a way to fix this broken system, now, before it breaks us all.

Get it done.

Sincerely,
